summer camp programme for at-risk children. This study aimed to evaluate the effects of the Summer Camp, a programme designed to prevent child abuse, through a 16-month follow-up of 40 children aged 6-11 years. The children were randomly allocated to either a control group of 20 children receiving normal education at school, or to a treatment group of 20 children participating in the Summer Camp programme for eight weeks each summer. Each child received a rating by their parents of the intensity of abuse the child had experienced at home. Children and parents also reported on the children's self-esteem, social support, and behavioural problems. At the end of the study, both groups were rated by teachers as well as by the parents, who also reported on their children's behaviour, self-esteem, 3e33713323
