Download -Q: Difference between $.ajax() and $.post() Recently we are using jQuery to send data to server. There are 2 ways to do it. Like: $.ajax({ url: "...", data: params, dataType: "json", success: function(response) { ... }, error: function(err) { ... } }); and: $.post("...", params, function(data) { ... }); In JavaScript(Ajax) one always use the $.post() method and not the $.ajax() method. I don't know the pros and cons of both of them. Is there any difference in both of them? Thanks in advance. A: jQuery's AJAX uses XMLHttpRequest (the native method) behind the scenes, where as the $.post method uses the XMLHttpRequest object directly, and is a pure JavaScript method. All you're doing is choosing how the jQuery methods will send data to the server. A: The main difference is that the $.post() method does not accept a callback, while the $.ajax() method does. So if you use $.post(), the success callback will fire after the request has been done, not after the request has actually been done. This is useful if you need to manipulate the response of the request from within the success callback, or if you need to manipulate the response before sending it back to the success callback.

Typical commercial sprinkler systems are characterized as either wet/dry or preaction type systems. Preaction type sprinkler systems are further broken down into either dry pipe or wet pipe systems. Dry pipe systems normally incorporate a pressurized supply line that delivers water to a primary control valve which is turned off
