What's new in D4: Season One Voice Over Script:

Drama Review I wanted to wait until the second season to drop my thoughts on a drama, but I was too excited. I can't remember an experience in life like being able to watch a Korean drama that is so good and so raw and emotional and so honestly engaging that when it ended, the nearest activity that kept me busy was a group dinner at my friends' house. Ugh! Who am I? How can I have that kind of time in my life?! The answer is: I'm an idiot. This is a meaty comeback attempt by K-Drama students who are all "meh" at acting and have somehow written themselves characters with flaws and quirks and insecurities that the script makes painfully obvious in the very first 30 minutes. It's compelling and rewarding enough to get me back into it, even if I wasn't completely on board when I first wanted to write something. It's like watching a regular human movie - where to begin, where to begin, how do I begin, when to begin, when to begin? It became a game that begged to be played. Also, you can be fell confident that these people have recently had their hearts broken. I try to make some kind of un-relative comparison to Dancing with the Stars because the format and the contestants are all gosh darned similar. Also, the Tae Jin Kims of the world go home, shedding their perfect-on-screen personas - or even losing a dance partner. If there's any critique I have, it's that it is not a flashback, just a snapshot. Not that it isn't fascinating to watch start from the beginning and watch these people learn how to dance and they learn their own personalities. If anything, it's difficult to watch because there isn't anything that lives up to the footage. Also, with a standard format, I can skim through episodes when I want. But with a drama, I want to watch through all of it. I still have to see the sequel. I'm not completely done with life, but I'm going to likely burn off a crazy-coffee-resume-project night to see it. 8 Seasons: Frequency III: Batilla The Bureau: Child's Play Dasom Ecopia My
