This invention relates to the device for minimizing the path a projectile has to travel to reach a target. Conventional artillery and mortar rounds have the greatest range, but have a difficult time penetrating hard targets such as armor and concrete walls. This problem is made worse when the round is fired with an obtuse angle of incidence with respect to the target. In the past, several devices have been used to increase the probability of direct hit, such as electronic delay fuzes (EDF) and millimeter wave radar (MMW). However, these devices suffer from a combination of cost, reliability and human interferences issues. In addition, MMW systems also require a clear line of sight to the target and cannot be used if a target is hidden inside a building, as is often the case in urban warfare. This invention is an improvement on the mortar round and thus will not be described here in detail. The invention is directed to the firing platform that fires mortar rounds. The mortar round contains a shape memory polymer (SMP) projectile. The SMP projectile is launched from a mortar tube, with an incendiary warhead with an EDF mounted in the nose. The SMP projectile is composed of a polymer tube with a shape memory alloy composition at the base. The shape memory alloy composition forms a heating element. Upon impact, the heating element retracts into the polymer tube, thereby protecting the EDF from damage. As the projectile moves through the tube, the heating element is arranged to move away from the EDF. At the end of the mortar tube, the heating element forms the warhead nose. In one aspect of the invention, a projectile is provided that is launched from a mortar tube and has an EDF mounted at its nose. The projectile is a shape memory polymer (SMP) projectile with a shape memory alloy (SMA) composition. The projectile includes a polymer tube; a bullet with an incendiary warhead located at the base of the projectile; and
