Mechanisms of lipid metabolism: role of micro-environment in hepatocytes and adipocytes. Recent studies demonstrated that the metabolic capacity of nonparenchymal cells, such as hepatocytes and adipocytes, greatly exceeds that of liver parenchymal cells. During the last decades, many reports have focused on the capacity of various nonparenchymal cells to convert lipids to lipoproteins and other metabolic products. Hepatocytes are a major source of lipoproteins in vivo, and they are also able to synthesize triacylglycerol in a tissue specific manner. Compared with adipocytes, hepatocytes are more efficient in the regulation of lipid metabolism, as they are able to synthesize triacylglycerol from free fatty acids while adipocytes principally use fatty acids for phospholipid synthesis. Thus, hepatocytes require a unique micro-environment to perform their efficient function in lipid metabolism. In fact, the physical properties of these cells, such as cell shape and the architecture of the organ, restrict several lipoprotein metabolism-related processes, including lipoprotein formation and regulation of lipoprotein receptors. This article reviews recent studies of lipid metabolism and how this metabolic capacity is regulated in nonparenchymal cells, with a special focus on the hepatic and adipocyte micro-environment. Almost all pre-event analysis of Indian elections is marred by myopia, which says the person making predictions on India is so past events that they are not aware of the changing social milieu. I have been reading the election result maps that
