Ever since we unveiled Alderac, a 3D fantasy RPG that would allow you to roam the Lands Between in search of new adventures, we have received a large number of your warm messages expressing your appreciation for the game. However, due to our limited resources, we realized that we were going to be facing a problem in the long term. And so we decided to take a step back and rethink our entire production plan. However, as we re-examined our situation, we have decided that the goal of developing Alderac as a new fantasy action RPG from the start would be a path that would require more time and effort than we had anticipated, and we decided to postpone the development of Alderac. This decision came at a time when there was widespread concern about declining Japanese gaming industry conditions due to changes in the overseas development environment. We felt that the development of Alderac would be able to continue even with this unanticipated environment. However, the recent postponement means that we will have to halt our production, and we understand that there may be a certain degree of disappointment in our supporters. The situation is not good. However, in the short term, we decided to continue producing the games in our pipeline and began to make preparations, including a restructuring of our game production team, to continue to develop a new game. We also received a large number of inquiries about our anime and manga projects. And so we decided to ensure that our traditional value, which we have aimed to uphold as a company ever since its foundation, would not collapse with the development of Alderac suspended. We have been developing our business in what we think to be a quite self-aware manner for many years. And so we are now in a position to say that we have not properly communicated the reasons for the development delay. And so I am sorry for the silence that has been our undoing. However, I want to reassure everyone that we have not abandoned our project. We will continue to produce games in our pipeline. And to our faithful readers, your warm words of support have been extremely meaningful to us. We will strive for the highest quality production from now on, and so we look forward to seeing you in the Lands Between. The following is my camel route: from("aws-s3:*").to("jwts:nouser-authenticate") where, I am trying to Custom Constraint named as "nouser-authenticate" on the connector of the endpoint where "nouser-authenticate" is the Gateway Response Message. I set spring security enabled. Now when ever I is trying to the endpoint which is connected to the route as below is getting the Default Response message from the Spring Security Filter. Authenticating the JWT token: ... ... /NOT AUTHORIZED/. Cannot get JWT token A: It appears you are confusing a MessagingConstraint (can be used with queues and bindings) and an Optional Parameter (can be used with regular endpoints to provide parameters or headers). It seems like you're using the messaging constraint. Since it is at the outside of the to() method/binding, spring sends the gateway response message just as you would expect. The message-constraint is one of this sort: / * Sets the verify parameter of the HTTP message. * * @param header the optional message header. */ public void setVerify(String header) { this.verify = header; } Authenticate the JWT token can be done in the usual way: / * Called for each request and specifies the headers which carry J

Q: Typescript interface doesn't recognize function parameters that exist in class definition I'm looking for confirmation of a Typescript design flaw or working as expected. I have an interface declared in a file, with a lot of function definitions: interface Test { test:(string, string) => any, testA: (string, string) => any, testB:(string, string) => any, testC:(string, string) => any } interface Test { testAsync: (param1: string, param2: string) => any; testWithNew:(string) => any; testWithNew2: (string, string) => any; } Test.prototype.test = function (param1, param2) { return true; } Test.prototype.testB = function (param1, param2) { return true; } Test.prototype.testA = function (param1, param2) { return true; } Test.prototype.testC = function (param1, param2) { return true; } The parameters (string, string) and (string, string) in test are types in the class, declared here (where the interfaces are defined): class Test { constructor() { this.test1 = 'lol'; this.test2 = 'lol'; } test(param1: string, param2: string) { // do something here } testAsync(param1: string, param2: string) { // do something async } testWithNew(param1: string) { // do something here } testWithNew2(param1: string, param2: string) { // do something here } } As you can see, I have another function with the same name as one of the interfaces. If I use the interface like this: let t = new
