[Images] Lufthansa Boeing 777-200LR for FSX, FS2004, P3D: - Model PCB Ripped.Q: When simulating on paper is there an optimal way to remove and place the polyhedron? I am currently working on an animation from an image and want to know if there is a method of removing the polyhedron from a mesh and moving it into another location, or if you just place the mesh at the coordinates you need the polyhedron to occupy (given the way things move in animation, you will need to animate it later). I am using a gl library for the mesh manipulation. If this is too open ended, how would I go about removing a polyhedron from a mesh, and moving it into another location? A: In general, if you're going to animate any kind of motion, you want to use constraint solvers to do so efficiently. That way you don't have to keep track of all the vertices and edges as a scene is being moved. If you're animating things such as drips or puddles in a wash of something such as water, it's a lot easier to change the textures of the objects. So I usually animate the texture of the bottom of the sink or tub, then I can change that texture and stay as efficient as possible. If I want to move a detailed item and have it stay detailed, I build the structure of it in edit mode, unwrap it and stick it back into my animation, and then redraw it as the final position in the scene. When you do this, you have a choice of how to unwrap it. You can bind the UV coordinates to the model coordinates, and then make the model's dimensions big enough so that you don't need to draw every single mesh face. Most 3D modeling software will let you set the ratio of the dimensions on the model and on the UV mapping. Some modeling programs do that automatically, but most of them only let you set a minimum dimension. You can then make your model's dimensions bigger than that so you don't have to draw all the faces. The downside to this is that if you try to animate something that moves in a weird way, you'll have to make the mesh bigger so that it doesn't
