The invention relates to a method of using a timing algorithm in a radio receiver for measuring the propagation time of a received signal in the radio receiver. It is known to measure the propagation time of a received signal by counting the number of zero crossings of the received signal in a received signal. It is an object of the invention to provide an improved method of measuring the propagation time of a received signal in a radio receiver. It is a further object of the invention to provide a method of measuring the propagation time of a received signal in a radio receiver which is less affected by the receiver's noise in the measurement of the propagation time. It is another object of the invention to provide a method of measuring the propagation time of a received signal in a radio receiver which does not require a prior knowledge of a channel characteristic of the radio channel being measured. It is known to use a current to be drawn from a voltage reference source as a clock signal in a radio receiver. The problem with the prior art is that the current to be drawn from the voltage reference source varies due to temperature and frequency drift of the clock source. The variation is a major error source in the receiver. The invention uses one or more receivers operating as a clock source in a radio receiver where there are at least two receivers connected in series. Each receiver is coupled to the voltage reference source. A digital counter is connected to each receiver. The digital counters count the number of zero crossings of the current to be drawn from the voltage reference source. At least one of the digital counters counts the number of zero crossings of the current to be drawn from the voltage reference source and another one of the digital counters counts the number of zero crossings of the current to be drawn from the voltage reference source different from the one or more counter, which is connected to the voltage reference source to which the one or more counter is connected. A propagation time of the received signal in the radio receiver is measured by determining the number of zero crossings counted by the digital counter connected to the counter, which is connected to the voltage reference source to which the other digital counter is connected. According to a further embodiment of the invention, the counter connected to the voltage reference source which is connected to the other digital counter is connected to the voltage reference source through a 0cc13bf012
