In a needle biopsy the whole organ or tissue is removed rather than just a microscopic piece of tissue (as in a core biopsy). A typical "cut-down" needle consists of a thin cylindrical shaft with a solid point at one end and a bevelled tip at the other. The diameter of the shaft should be smaller than that of the tissue to be obtained. The angle between the shaft and bevelled end should be less than 60°. In a core biopsy or "coring" the biopsy needle usually has a hollow tube with a retractable core, a solid screw-shaped plastic obturator attached to the shaft. The patient is placed in a supine or lateral position, depending on where the disease is situated. The needle is inserted with the shaft pointed downwards so that it pierces the skin and is guided to the area of the disease. The needle then is withdrawn slightly to avoid entering the underlying tissue. Once the needle is in the tissue that is affected, the retractable core with the sample is advanced to take a biopsy of the affected tissue. This movement is accomplished by twisting the handle in the direction opposite to the bevelled tip. The sample is removed through the needle and is then processed to extract the tissue, e.g., sent for examination under a microscope. Depending on the age and size of the patient, it may be necessary to place a local anaesthetic on the area prior to the biopsy. A biopsy needle can be single-use or multi aa67ecbc25
