A series of hypothetical black hole collisions has been studied recently, showing that it is possible to get collision speeds much higher than the speed of light. These models may have implications for the central engine of gamma-ray bursts, as the collision could be the source of cosmic gamma rays. The backreaction on the binary due to the collision may also lead to the formation of a new type of object, the merger remnant. We study the various properties of the merger remnant and suggest how it can be distinguished from neutron star or black hole binaries.10 Great Gifts for the Eclectic, Soul-Searching & Kid-Obsessed Coffee Geek
