- Phenotypic heterogeneity of prostate cancers using quantitative immunohistochemical analysis of estrogen receptor alpha (ERalpha) protein expression. We used quantitative immunohistochemistry to examine tissue microarrays (TMAs) of prostate cancers for the presence of ERalpha protein, using TMAs that were assembled to precisely replicate the available tumor tissue blocks. The expression of the ERalpha protein was examined on TMAs from a total of 89 patients, comprised of 57 benign prostatic hyperplasias (BPHs), 20 primary and 20 recurrent high grade prostate cancers (HGPCs), and a separate set of 10 p53-null HGPCs. ERalpha protein expression was increased in the cytoplasmic and/or the nuclear compartments of BPH epithelium as compared with HGPCs. Nuclear ERalpha expression was elevated in 65% of BPHs and 75% of HGPCs, and cytoplasmic ERalpha expression was increased in 25% of BPHs, 70% of HGPCs, and 50% of p53-null HGPCs. A significant association between nuclear and cytoplasmic ERalpha protein expression was observed in the BPHs and in the p53-null HGPCs. The distribution of ERalpha immunoreactivity among the nuclei of HGPCs was defined as high, medium, or low by using the Mann-Whitney test. The relative quantitation of ERalpha protein expression was similar for both cytoplasmic and nuclear compartments and the differences in positivity for nuclear ERalpha between BPH and HGPC were statistically significant. These data suggest that the presence of ERalpha in the nucleus and the cytoplasm may differentially influence the growth of prostate cancer.

Patreon: Official Website: Twitter: Facebook: Instagram: The Scientist has finally figured out how to make fabric supercomputers. The challenge was to make the fiber silk in vitro, that is, in a petri dish instead of the spinning wheel and silkworms we've been using up till now. In vivo, silk exists to maintain the living environment of the silkworm, clearing out foreign bodies and waste, and supporting the molt cycle. In vitro, silk will only do this if it's in a very specific form. Its strength, for example, will be radically reduced, and it may not be able to keep its shape for long. The challenge is, according to a researcher from Japan's Tohoku University, to find a specific solution. The solution is there, he's convinced, in a recently discovered protein made by caterpillars. It interacts specifically with and makes silk stronger. Vox.com is a news website that helps you cut through the noise and understand what's really driving the events in the headlines.
