I have just built a new PC with three hard disks and an empty drive (not connected to the internet). I am planning to install Ubuntu on the empty disk (without using the network). How can I do it? Which drives to be installed, which partitions to be made? If it is possible to install Ubuntu in a USB drive, how? A: Use GParted and shrink the drive where Ubuntu is going to be installed. GParted is a partitioning tool included in Ubuntu, so you can install it right away. To start, right-click on your drive in the Disk Manager and select Explore to open GParted. In the GParted window, select the empty drive. Click the green plus icon at the upper-left corner to add another partition. When the dialog pops up, you'll be able to name the partition for your Ubuntu installation. The default name is "Ubuntu" unless you change it. Now, select the free space and click the plus icon to create a new partition, creating it within your empty drive. The partition should be created in the free space you have available. A notification will appear on the screen, informing you that you're going to create a new partition. Give your partition a label of "extended" because your partition is a logical one. Now, click the green plus icon again and select the "extended" partition to create a new extended partition. Name the extended partition

Latest Autodesk Product Activation Code, serial, serial number, key:Q: Propagate changes to a target object Is it possible to propagate changes made to a target object in the state of a property back to the parent? I.e. here is the situation: public class A { public int I { get; set; } } public class B { private A _a; public A A { get { return _a; } } if I set property I of a to 5 in class A, then should the value of I of a in class B be reflected as 5? Is there something better than setting up events and dispatchers? A: You can't. The B.A property is just that: A property. The internal state of B.A is unrelated to the internal state of A. One way you could do this is by implementing the INotifyPropertyChanged interface on your A class and raising an event when your I property changes. Then when you receive this event you could set the B.A property accordingly. That being said, this doesn't seem particularly useful. You can implement INotifyPropertyChanged on your classes and raise the event when your properties change and the B class will receive this notification. The Department of Defense successfully tested a sea-launch version of the Long-Range Standoff Weapon (LRSO) in open ocean near California's coast earlier this month. The trials were conducted in the Pacific Ocean on May 3. "The test and evaluation of the 'Sea-launched, Ultra-Long-Range Strike Weapon' demonstrate enhanced lethality, controllability and availability of the sea-launched strike weapon, while demonstrating the ability to operate from large, ocean-going naval ships," said Lieutenant Colonel Randall Dalton, LRSO project officer. The
