Differential expression of H2A.Z in meiosis and the pachytene checkpoint of the germinal vesicle reveals the absence of H2A.Z in the centromere. A polyclonal antibody against H2A.Z, a nucleosome-associated variant of H2A, is reported. The antibody is specific for H2A.Z and does not recognize H2A.Z.1 or H2A.Z.2. Immunocytochemical analysis of chromosomes in spermatocytes of the adult mouse showed that H2A.Z is enriched in centromeres. In G2-arrested mouse gonocytes, the antibody bound to a cluster of H2A.Z on the centromere, but not to the chromatin. During meiotic prophase the signal localized to discrete spots, and at the onset of the first meiotic division the antibody labelled the centromeres of the bivalents; but not any of the four H1-positive regions of the chromatin. These spots of H2A.Z most likely represent the trivalent, which is located on the centromeres and is present in the pachytene stage. At the onset of the second meiotic division, this cluster was absent in the chromatin of the pachytene, but was observed in the homologous centromeres of the telophase nuclei. It is concluded that centromeric H2A.Z is absent in prophase I, which shows that H2A.Z is not a component of the centromere. We provide evidence that H2A.Z is enriched in chromatin regions of the developing pachytene. This seems to reflect a maturation process of the centromere, a role for H2A.Z in the centromere, which is not associated with nucleosomes, is discussed.
