The template for a great team game is already a great game, but people need to set aside the business motive that got them to start that way. I've worked with lots of great teams that started out promising, but fell into a trap of iterative development where they added a feature, worked on that, then failed to recognize that they have no real understanding of the product that they're building, a product people don't want. That's why such teams begin to create features that would be worthwhile, but fall apart as they add more and more points of failure.

I've also worked with teams that had a solid understanding of the business problem, and just weren't building features that would give them
