A generation on, Davie heads World Cup project at Island Concessions A crew from the Island Concessions plant transforms wine barrels at the production facility in Clementon. MIKE SEGAR / STAFF David Davie knew immediately after earning a contract to build the 2007 World Cup stadium in Dunedin that the work would be "incredible." It was not long after the former Island Concessions employee had joined Premier Mike Middleton's staff as chief executive of the government's tourism agency, Destination New Zealand, that Davie was showing Middleton the company's facility in Port Hills, midway between Auckland and Wellington. "He said he really wanted this work. "We got one of the biggest contracts for any New Zealand project," said Davie, speaking at a public meeting in June to share information c6a93da74d
