alternatively, and an increasingly common method, is the ability for software to generate one-time codes for you online. these are usually sent to your phone via text and can be printed out in a qr code for offline use. for example, lastpass and yubico generate and send one-time codes to your phone, which is how you log in to websites that use them. security keys provide an extremely high level of security. not only can they generate a code on demand, they can generate one for multiple accounts at once. therefore, you need to have a different password for each site you want to log in to. another good idea is to use different usernames and passwords for all your accounts so that if one account is breached you wont have to worry about all the other ones. if someone gets access to the email associated with your account (such as an imap account), theyll have access to your password. likewise, if a password gets leaked, then the thieves data is gone forever. if your bank or retailer offers two-step verification, you can further strengthen your accounts security with it. to enable two-step verification for a website account, just add the verification code you receive on your phone or email to the text box for the account. google does this with its google authenticator app and google is one of the few companies that require sms based two-step verification. both google and apple offer an app that generates codes for you, and there are also many third-party apps. we tested the yubico security key, which has one of the best two-factor options on the market. 5ec8ef588b
